Chris,

I think Option 2 is generally more reasonable, but I think both could work. My concern with option 1 is if the building or the driveway goes down in the wrong spot by even just a couple of feet, the turnaround can become non-conforming. Option one also comes with the added concern of fill over the edge of the cliff which would need to be considered as a part of this permit.

This drawing is an acceptable level of effort for a non-engineered grading permit, and the only remaining items are a breakdown of your quantities (I know you've got encompass working on that) and confirmation from your neighbors that building the driveway/hammerhead partially onto their property is okay with them. I'll communicate this to CDS and if they have further questions, they can follow up with you.

Given the complexity of the project, it may be reasonable to try to schedule a sit down with both PW and CDS (maybe even WDFW if they're up for it) so that we can go through this together and walk away all on the same page. Not a requirement, but it might be helpful.
